In recent years there has been a substantial rise in autism spectrum disorder diagnoses with one in 40 eight-year-olds now identified as being on the autistic spectrum compared to one in 150 ten years ago. The reason for this rise has been identified as the broadening diagnostic criteria, increased awareness of the condition and access to services. When it comes to autism spectrum disorder, parents face a difficult time trying to understand how their children are feeling. Children with Autism Spectrum Disorder have great difficulty in empathizing with others. Therefore, they have limited capacity to imagine how others are feeling or what they might be thinking about. Babies can be confronted with challenges that they may not have faced before. This improves their ability to empathize with others which is essential for developing good communication skills. I think it's important for parents to stay actively involved with their children's play activities. It's not enough to simply buy the game or watch your child play without being able to provide any kind of feedback or feedback at all. It's also important for parents to keep an open mind and try new games, so they encourage their children to try different games and activities on the spectrum.
